The Villager

"Wearing a blend of traditional band costumes and 1920s-style suits and skirts – with a trumpet player dressed as a Trojan soldier and a washboard player sporting a giant bird head with purple feathers thrown in the mix – the band marched through the crowd and crammed all of its members onto the small stage. H.M.B. then got the otherwise-mellow crowd dancing and cheering, making it clear why they are in such high demand."

THE TIMES

"Hungry March Band weaves its way through the crowd on to the stage. Mardi gras beads swing, saxes buck, trombones extend. There's a cabaret feel, with wigs, goggles, pigtails, spinning bass drum mallets...The playing is tight and immaculate."

The New York Times

"The bar was used as a stage by a cymbalist for the Hungry March Band, who muscled their way into the 180-square-foot room on Saturday about an hour before the visit by the authorities, dressed in full game-day regalia."

"New York City's Hungry March Band was a pep band gone bad, the fight songs furious jazz-funk, the cheerleaders moonlighting go-go dancers. They were one of a number of ensembles that, through costume and choreography, upended the conformist order of a high school marching band into something mutinous, as if to retroactively unleash the full power of teenaged id."
